Reviewer comments:

Introduction: This research article delves into the profound influence of modern corporations and industries on global economic development. As these entities have expanded with rapid industrial growth, their large-scale production and extensive resource consumption have inadvertently led to the creation of serious environmental threats. Chief among these is environmental pollution, particularly the issue of toxic hazardous material waste disposal. The study underscores the necessity of holding corporate legal entities accountable for environmental crimes, a concept known as corporate criminal liability. The research primarily aims to analyze the application of corporate criminal liability in cases involving the illegal disposal of hazardous toxic waste into the environment, as well as to assess the effectiveness of corporate law enforcement in such scenarios.

Key Findings and Analysis:

1. The Environmental Challenge: The research effectively highlights the severe environmental challenges posed by large-scale industrial activities and the disposal of toxic hazardous waste. This recognition is crucial in understanding the urgency of addressing corporate responsibility for environmental crimes.
2. Corporate Criminal Liability: The study delves into the concept of corporate criminal liability, emphasizing the importance of holding both individual legal subjects and corporate legal entities accountable for environmental offenses. This is a pivotal aspect of the analysis, as it sets the stage for the examination of the practical application of this concept.
3. Shortcomings in Prosecuting Corporate Environmental Crimes: One of the key findings is the identification of significant obstacles in the investigation, prosecution, and the establishment of environmental impacts in cases involving corporate environmental crimes. These barriers limit the delivery of complete justice in such cases, which is a critical concern.
4. The Doctrine of Strict Liability: The research offers a compelling solution to the challenges faced in prosecuting corporate environmental crimes. The proposal to apply the doctrine of strict liability in cases of environmental pollution, particularly in waste dumping incidents, is a noteworthy recommendation. Strict liability eliminates the need to prove intent or negligence, shifting the focus to the act itself rather than the motive behind it. Conclusion: In conclusion, this research article provides a comprehensive review of the interplay between modern corporations, environmental pollution, and corporate criminal liability. It effectively underscores the pressing need to address corporate responsibility for environmental crimes and the challenges associated with prosecuting such offenses. The recommendation to apply the doctrine of strict liability in cases of environmental pollution, such as the dumping of toxic hazardous waste, presents a practical and efficient solution to enhance the accountability of corporations and expedite the prosecution process. Overall, this research makes a significant contribution to the field of environmental law and corporate accountability, offering valuable insights for policymakers, legal practitioners, and scholars seeking to strengthen environmental protection measures.
